New Cross-Border Reporting Rules, What Deal Teams Need to Know

Marcus Webb • Esq., Corporate & M&A Attorney, Sterling & Cross

Multinational deal teams now have a shorter runway to get cross-border disclosures right. The latest round of updated reporting rules tightens both what has to be disclosed and how quickly it has to happen once a transaction crosses a jurisdictional threshold, and the deal teams that build it into the timeline early are the ones that don't get caught by it late.

What actually changed

The updated rules expand the categories of cross-border transactions that trigger a disclosure obligation, and in several jurisdictions shorten the window for making that filing after signing or closing. Beneficial ownership reporting has also been tightened, meaning deal structures that once sat comfortably below a reporting threshold may not anymore.

Why this matters for deal timelines

Reporting obligations that used to be a post-closing formality are increasingly becoming a pre-closing condition in some jurisdictions, which means a late or incomplete filing can delay closing itself, not just create paperwork after the fact. Deal teams that treat this as a Day 1 diligence item, rather than a closing checklist item, are the ones avoiding last-minute scrambles.

Where deal teams get caught out

The most common gap we see is treating cross-border reporting as a single filing rather than a set of parallel obligations across every jurisdiction touched by the deal structure. A holding company in one country, an operating subsidiary in another, and a financing entity in a third can each trigger separate, differently-timed obligations under the same transaction.

What to do now

Map every jurisdiction your deal structure touches against its current reporting thresholds before you're deep into negotiation, not after signing. Build the filing deadlines into your closing checklist as hard dates, not soft ones, and confirm who on the deal team owns each jurisdiction's filing before it becomes urgent.

If your deal team is navigating a structure that spans multiple jurisdictions, it is worth mapping the reporting exposure early, while there is still room to adjust the structure if needed.
